The Health Crisis in Gamma

Seven months since the incursion of forces from Delta into Gamma, the costs go beyond the 887 casualties. At least 12,000 people – some soldiers, mostly civilians – have suffered injuries from a war conducted largely by drone operators safe far from the conflict. Of these, over 5,000 have succumbed to due to inadequate care as the damage to Gamma's previously high quality infrastructure has left the country in a state worse than many developing nations. While international aid has been able to provide medications, including for chronic conditions, essential health procedures ranging from obstetrics to cardiac stents are impossible to access for most patients.

The UN has denounced Delta's incursion into Gamma as violating the Geneva Convention and other international law with respect to targeting civilian infrastructure. However, seven months since the initial incursion, there seems to be no end in sight.
