The Price of War in Gamma

Gamma City used to be a popular tourist location, the perfect place where you could count on working air-conditioning, potable water, paved streets... and scrumptious meals at a highly favorable exchange rate.

No longer. Seven months since the shocking incursion of forces from Delta into Gamma, Gamma City is unrecognizable. Residents of Gamma City can no longer count on access to electricity, and an increasing number of water sources are no longer safe due to artillery damage to local water treatment facilities. Citizens left homeless after damage to their homes now sleep in the Opera House which used to host some of the most famed symphonies in the world.

With no end in sight for the war, the UN is coordinating with Germany, Switzerland, and other willing partners to support the safe transport of children to temporary foster families where they may continue their schooling away from the immediate dangers of war.
